Steelbow [2] (stī·lbōu). Sc. Law. Obs. exc. Hist. Forms: 5–6 steil-, 6 stele-, 7 steelbow. [f. Steel sb.[1] + Bow [3].

It corresponds to the F. cheptel de fer (see Littré), lit. 'iron farm-stock', and to early mod.G. stählin vieh, eisern vieh (in German Law Latin pecora chalybea, ferrea), and obs. Da. jernfæ. These terms denote the quantity of live stock which a farming tenant receives from his landlord on entering, under a contract to restore the same quantity and value at the end of his tenancy. This is precisely the sense of steelbow, exc. that the Sc. term seems to have been extended to apply to dead as well as live stock. The F. cheptel de fer is also used, like steelbow, for the species of tenure or contract under which cattle are so held by a tenant. In early mod.Ger. there were other legal terms containing the adjs. stählin 'made of steel', eisern 'made of iron', in the figurative sense 'rigidly fixed in amount': e.g. stähline gült, a fixed regular payment or income: stähline pfründe, a church living subject to no deductions. The figure of speech doubtless comes down from very early Germanic legal formulæ; but evidence is wanting. See Schilter Glossarium, s.v. Stal; also Grimm Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer (ed. 4, 1899) II. 131.]

The mod. ON. støypa; and even if it be referred to an OE. sttepan* corresponding to the ON. vb., the development of sense appears less natural on this view than on that suggested above.]

Stem (stem), *sb.*2 Naut. Forms: 1 stefn, stafna or -ne, stemn, 5–6 steme, 6–7 stemme, 7 stemb, 7–8 stemm, 6– stem. [OE. stemn, stefn str. masc. (also stefna wk. masc. or stefne wk. fem.), originally a specific application of Stem *sb.*1 in the sense 'tree-trunk'. The nautical use occurs (sometimes with differentiated form) in several Tent. langs.: OFris. stevene (WFris. stjûwn, NFris. stëven), Du., LG. steven (whence G. steven; MDu. had also steve), OS. stamn, ON. stafn, stamn masc. (whence ME. Stam *sb.*1), Da. stavn, also (? from LG.) stævn, Sw. (? from LG.) stäf.

After the OE. period the native word does not occur in our quots. until late in the 15th c., though the 14th and 15th c. have several examples of Stam (from the equivalent ON. form) and of the compound Forestam. The native form must of course have been preserved in oral tradition alongside the Scandinavian form, which disappears in the 15th c. A few examples of Steven are found in Sc. writers of the 16th c.; whether this descends from OE. stefn, or a late adoption from LG. or Du., cannot be determined.

[A Com. WGer. strong verb, with j-present-stem (cf. SHAPE v.). The original conjugation (OTeut. type stapjan, *stōp-, stapan-) is completely evidenced only in English and Frisian: OE. stæppan, steppan, pa. t. stóp, pa. ppl. (be)stapen, corresponds to OFris. steppa* (3rd sing. stepth, stapth, subj. steppe), pa. t. stôp, pa. pple. stapen. The present-stem is normally represented also in OHG. stephen (MHG. stepfen), and WFlem.

stepptn; the strong pa. t. in OS. stōp and in WFris. sloep, which is the only trace of the strong inflexion surviving in any mod.Teut. dialect. The continental WGer. langs. have a synonymous wk. vb. with pp and without umlaut, (M)LG., (M)Du. stappen, mod.Fris. stappe, OHG. staphōn (MHG., mod.G. stapfen):—WGer. stappōjan*, where the doubled p appears to be due to derivation from the sb. WGer. stappon-* (see STEP sb.); in LG. and Du., however, the history of the form may be complicated with that of the original j- present.

In OE. the normal form stęppan was Anglian, while WS. had the form stæppan, the anomalous vowel of which has not been satisfactorily accounted for. In ME. the forms with a are confined to certain southern writers (cf. mod. Somerset staap). The present Sc. stap, recorded from the 17th c., appears to be a late development.

The normal strong pa. t. and pa. pple. survive into the 14th and 15th centuries, but beside them appear two analogical formations: steop, stepen, app. modelled on the reduplicating verbs (cf. the similar development in MDu. stiep pa. t.); and stap, stappe of uncertain origin. Beside the regular stapen there is also a new pa. pple. stopen. Weak forms are found from the end of the 13th century, and from the 16th century are universal.

The affinities of the Teut. root staþ-* are uncertain. On the assumption that the form with single þ has been altered by some analogy from stapp-*, with pp representing Indogermanic pn, possible cognates are OSl. (and Russian) stopa, step, pace, stepeń step, degree.]

Step-, OE. stéop- (earlier stéup-, Northumb. stéap-), corresponding to OFris. stiap-, stiep- (NFris. stjap-, sjap-, stip-, WFris. stiep-), MLG. (irreg.) stēf- (mod. LG. staif-), (M)Du. (irreg.) stief-, OHG. stiuf- (MHG., mod.G. stief-), ON. stjúp-, (MSw. stiup-, stiuf-; mod.Sw. stiuf-, styf-; Da. stif-, stiv-, now superseded by sted-):—OTeut. steupo-*; a Com. Teut. combining element (not recorded in Gothic), prefixed to terms of relationship (as son, father, brother) to form designations for the degrees of affinity resulting from the remarriage of a widowed parent. The primitive sense of the word is indicated by the use of OE. stéopbearn, -cild (STEPBAIRN, STEPCHILD) for 'orphan', and by the cognates, OE. ástíeped bereaved, OHG. stiufen (also ar-, bistiufen) to bereave. Etymologically, stepfather (stepmother) might be rendered 'one who becomes a father (mother) to an orphan', and stepson (stepdaughter) 'an orphan who becomes a son (a daughter)' by the marriage of the surviving parent. It is uncertain which of these two applications of the prefix is the original one; all branches of Teut. (exc. Gothic) have both, and also the extended use in stepbrother, stepsister. ON. had shortened forms, stjúpa stepmother, stjúp-r (mod.Icel. stjúpi) stepson. In Du. and LG., and in later Scandinavian, the p of OTeut. steupo-* is anomalously represented by f instead of p. This is prob. not due to HG. influence, but to assimilation to the following f in the compound stepfather (cf. the early ME. form steffadyr). A solitary OE. example of this anomaly occurs in the form stéfdohtor (quot. 912 s.v. STEPDAUGHTER). Occasional forms of the prefix in ME. are stip- (styp-), sti-, ste-, stappe-.

In 1755 Johnson says that stepmother is the only one of the compounds of step- that has survived in general use. At the present day stepfather is hardly less frequently used, and stepson, -daughter, -child, -brother, -sister are by no means rare, while stepdame occurs in somewhat archaistic language (chiefly fig.). In the 16th and 17th c. a few writers employed the prefix in nonce-formations which would now seem un-English, as step-devil, a term of abhorrence for a stepmother; step-duchess, the stepmother of a duke's children; step-lord, one who has the position of a lord without the true lord's affection for his subjects; step-Tully, one who assumes the function of a Cicero. New formations with the prefix, denoting actual relations of affinity, do not appear earlier than the 19th c.; in the latter part of the century they became somewhat common, chiefly as more or less jocular nonce-words, though one or two of them, as step-nephew, -niece, have obtained some currency in serious use. The older compounds of step- are in this Dictionary treated as main words; the following examples illustrate the extended applications of the prefix from the 16th c. onwards.

Ster, obs. form of Star, Steer, Stir.

-ster, suffix. (Forms: 1 -istræ, -estre, later -ystre, -istre, 2–4 -estre, 4–5 -eatir, 5 -ister, 4–7 -star(e, 4–5 -estere, -stere, 4– -ster), corresponding to MLG. -(e)ster, (M)Du. and mod.Fris. -ster, represents a WGer. type -strjōn-, forming feminine agent-nouns, prob. a derivative of the OTeut. -stro- forming nouns of action, as in ON. bakstr masc., act of baking, OHG. galstar neut., incantation.

The existence of the suffix is not attested for High German, OS. or OFris.; the supposed examples sometimes cited, OHG. wagastria lance, agalastra (OS. agastria) magpie, OS. hamstra marmot, ranestra some plant, are very doubtful; even if the suffix be formally identical with the agential suffix, it has not the same function. In Du. -ster regularly forms feminine agent-nouns corresponding to masculines in -er, e. g. schrijfster fem. of schrijver a writer. In MLG., and in mod.Fris., although most of the nouns in -ster are fem., several occur as masc., e.g. MLG. bedriegster deceiver, N Fris. grewster gravedigger, wäwster weaver.

In the original types of the formation the suffix was prob. preceded by the thematic vowel of the word to which it was attached, thus becoming -astrjōn-, -istrjōn, †-ustrjōn-. In the historical forms, however, there is no evidence of this (unless in the OE. byrdistræ: see below); in Du. and Fris. the suffix is -ster without prefixed vowel; in MLG. usually -ster, sometimes -ester, app. merely for euphony. In OE. it is -estre, which does not produce umlaut, though it is often added to a stem containing an umlaut-vowel.

In OE. -estre was freely used to form fem. agent-nouns, in exactly the same manner in which -ere (-er[1]) was used to form masc. agent-nouns. Thus it was appended to the pres.-stems of verbs, as in lǽrestre female teacher, hoppestre female dancer, and to certain monosyllabic nouns of action as in sangestre songstress, séamestre sempstress, lybbestre female poisoner or witch. In a few instances fem. agent-nouns were formed by the substitution of -estre for the masc. suffix -a (:— -jon-), as in bigengestre fem. of bigenga cultivator, worshipper, webbestre (Webster) beside webbe as fem. of webba weaver. Lattéow, leader, functionally an agent-n. though without agential suffix, gave rise to a fem. lættewestre. An anomalous formation is huntigestre (instead of huntestre*) huntress, which occurs once as a variant reading for huntiege.

In OE. the suffix may be said to have retained its original function, for the few instances in which it is used as a masculine are renderings of Latin designations of men exercising functions which among the English were peculiar to women, as byrdistræ embroiderer (gl. blaciarius, primiculariius), bæcestre baker (gl. pistor), séamestre tailor (gl. sartor), wæscestre washer (gl. fullo).

In northern ME., however, perh. owing to the frequent adoption by men of trades like weaving, baking, tailoring, etc., the suffix came very early to be used, indiscriminately with -er[1], as an agential ending irrespective of gender; thus in the Cursor Mundi (a 1300) demestre (see Dempster) appears instead of demere (Deemer), a judge, bemestre instead of bemer a trumpeter. It is probable that -ster was often preferred to -er as more unambiguously referring to the holder of a professional function, as distinguished from the doer of an occasional act. In Scotland, baxter and webster survived as masculines down to the 19th c. The only word of this formation that in Scotland has remained exclusively feminine is Sewster.

In the south the suffix continued to be predominantly feminine throughout the ME. period. The OE. formations, baxter, seamster, tapster, were in southern English usually feminine before 1500; many new designations of occupation, originally feminine, arose in ME., as bellringestre, hordestre treasurer (Winteney Rule St. Benet, 13th c.), hotestre fem. of hotere commander (Ayenbite), brewster, dyester, litster, throwster, huckster; also spinster, which alone of the group has survived (though with change of sense) solely as a feminine. A few feminines in -estere were formed to correspond to masculines in -er(e of French origin: fruitestere, tumbestere, tumblestere, wafrestere. As a feminine suffix of purely agential import, -ster was in the 14th c. still used for new formations by some writers, but was generally replaced by the French -eresse. Thus MS. Bodl. 277 of the Wyclif Bible has chesister, daunster, dwelster, weilster, where other copies have cheseresse, daunseresse (leperesse), dwelleresse, weileresse.

From the 16th c. onwards the older words in -ster, so far as they survived, have been regarded as masculines, and several of them have given rise to feminines in -ess, as backstress, seamstress, songstress, huckstress. In the modern English period the suffix has been very productive, but it is doubtful whether any of the new formations are really derived from verbs; in every instance in which this would be formally possible there is a sb. of the same form as the vb., and the derivative is (in present feeling at least) associated rather with the sb. than the vb. so in gamester, rhymester (late 16th c.), drugster (1611; but cf. druggister), and the much later dabster, jokester, punster, trickster, tipster. The formation here imitates that of trade designations; hence the disparaging sense, e.g. in rhymester, jokester, as compared with rhymer, joker. An anomalous use is that in rubster (17th c.) something used to rub with.

In the 16th c. two formations on adjs. occur: youngster (after which oldster was formed later) and lewdster.

Stereobate (ste·riobēt). Arch. [= F. stéréobate, It. stereobate, ad. L. stereobata, ad. Gr. στερεοβάτης, f. στερεός solid + -βάτης as in στυλοβάτης STYLOBATE.] A solid mass of masonry serving as a base for a wall or a row of columns. (See also quots.)

The term occurs only once in ancient use (Vitruvius III. iii). Vitruvius explains it as a massive wall built from the ground as a support for a row of columns. Modern writers (Latin in the 15–16th c., Italian, French, and English) have used it in various applications. According to some, stereobate is the generic term for a basement either under a wall or a row of columns, and a 'stylobate' is a stereobate of which the superstructure is columnar. Others restrict stereobate to the basement of a wall, as distinguished from stylobate, a basement under a row of columns. Others, again, use stereobate for the whole basement, and stylobate for the upper portion of this, which is added when there are columns.

1836 PARKER Gloss. Archit. (1840) 206 Stylobate, Stereobate, the basement or substructure of a temple below the columns. a 1840 HOSKING Archit. in Encycl. Brit. (ed. 7) III. 470 Stereobate, a basement. It is sought to make a distinction between this term and Stylobate q. v., by restricting the latter to its real import, and applying stereobate to a basement in the absence of columns. 1875 Encycl. Brit. II. 441/1 [Italian Architecture] A basement is either a low stereobate or a lofty story, according as it is intended to support a single ordinance [etc.].

Hence Stereoba·tic a., pertaining to or having the character of a stereobate.

Stereochemistry (ste:riōke·mistri). [f. STEREO- + CHEMISTRY.] That department of chemistry which deals with theoretical differences in the relative position in space of atoms in a molecule, in relation to differences in the optical and chemical properties of the substances.

1890 V. MEYER in Smithsonian Rep. 366 Le Bel and van 't Hoff..considering those substances which turo the plane of polarization of light, arrived at..a conception of the aggregation of the atoms within the molecules in space. Thus a field of study was created which van 't Hoff called 'la chimie dans l'espace' and which we now call Stereochemistry. 1899 Dublin Rev. Oct. 340 This is called Geometrical Isomerism or Stereochemistry.

So Ste:reo-che·mical a., pertaining to stereochemistry.

1. An instrument for obtaining, from two pictures (usually photographs) of an object, taken from slightly different points of view (corresponding to the positions of the two eyes), a single image giving the impression of solidity or relief, as in ordinary vision of the object itself.

In the original form of the instrument (reflecting stereoscope), invented by Wheatstone, the images were combined by means of mirrors placed at a suitable angle; the common form (refracting or lenticular stereoscope), invented afterwards by Brewster, has two tubes each containing a lens, through which the two pictures are viewed by the corresponding eyes.

Of uncertain origin, but probably a late OE. formation in -LING[1].

The earliest known example (in the Fr. form esterlin) is believed to occur in a charter of the Norman abbey of Préaux (Round Cal. Documents, France, p. 111). The date is supposed to be either 1085 or 1104, on the evidence of the golden number, but so far as this is concerned it might be later by 19 years or a multiple of 19; the cartulary is of the 13th c. Ordericus Vitalis (a 1145) has in Latin libræ sterilensium, and libræ sterilensis monetæ, as if he took the word for an -ing derivative of a place-name. The Anglo-Latin sterlingus is cited by Ducange from the year 1180. Continental examples are frequent in the 13th c., the excellence of the English penny having procured for it extensive currency in foreign countries; in Oct. 1202, Baldwin Count of Flanders contracts to pay to certain Venetian nobles 'the sum of 121 ounces in marks sterling (marcas sterlinorum) at the rate of 13 "solidi" and 4 "denarii" for each silver mark' (Rawdon Brown, Cal. State Papers, Venice I. 1).

The word, if of English origin, presumably was descriptive of some peculiar characteristic of the new Norman penny. The most plausible explanation is that it represents a late OE. steorling*, 'coin with a star' (f. steorra star), some of the early Norman pennies having on them a small star. An old conjecture is that the word is derived from stær a starling (STARE sb.[1]), and alludes to the four birds (usually called 'martlets') on some coins of Edward the Confessor; but if this were so the early form would normally have been starling. Until recently, the prevailing view was that the word was a shortening of EASTERLING. Walter de Pinchebek (c 1300) gives this explanation, saying that the coin was originally made by Easterling moneyers; but the stressed first syllable would not have been dropped.

In Scotland the word was confused with the name of the town of Stirling, anciently Strivelin; hence the β forms common in the 15th and 16th centuries.]

The word is not found in any MS. earlier than the 11th c., and the form stigweard, though certainly the original, is recorded only in a late transcript. The first element is most probably OE. stig a house or some part of a house (cf. stigwita house-dweller); this is doubtless cogn. with stigu STY sb. and stígan to climb (STY v.), but there is no ground for the assumption that stigweard originally meant 'keeper of the pig-sties'.

The Eng. title is quoted by Froissart in the OF. form estuard. The rare ON. stíðvarðr is adopted from OE.

Since the 16th c. the definitions of the word have often been influenced by the supposed etymologies stead+ward and stow+ward.]

After the Norman Conquest, the title was the Eng. equivalent of the OF. seneschal, med.L. senescallus, dapifer, which, in England as on the Continent, had come to designate an office in the royal household held only by a great noble of the realm. Obs. exc. Hist.

3. a. (Lord High) Steward or †Great Steward of England. Recorded since the 15th cent. as: The title of a high officer of state, the earlier senescallus Angliae. Since the accession of Henry IV this officer has been appointed only on the occasion of a coronation, at which he presides, or for the trial of a peer, which takes place in the Court of the Lord High Steward if Parliament be not sitting.

Originally this office seems to have carried little more than the privilege of waiting on the king's table, especially on state occasions. But it soon became hereditary in the earls of Leicester, and powers similar to those of the French seneschal were claimed for it by Simon de Montfort. This development was checked by the attainder of Simon, and the office finally fell in to the crown by the accession of its holder Henry IV.

b. (Lord High) Steward of Scotland. Hist. The first officer of the Scottish King in early times; he had control of the royal household, great administrative powers, and the privilege of leading the army into battle. The office, described as senescallatus Scotiae in a charter of Malcolm IV, 1158, fell in to the crown upon the accession of Robert the Steward as Robert II, whence the name of the royal house of Stuart; but the title was given to the heir-apparent until the Union. Great Steward of Scotland is now a title of the Prince of Wales.

Teut. root stik-* to pierce, be sharp (whence Stick, Stitch sbs.) :– Indogermanic stig-* (:steig-*) found in Gr. στίζειν (:–stigy-*) to prick, στιγμή, στίγμα prick, point (see Stigma), L. instīgāre to spur on, Instigate; also with nasal infix, in Goth. stiggan to thrust, L. -stinguĕre to prick (distinguĕre to distinguish); and without initial s in Skr. tij- to be sharp, tigmá sharp. The Teut. root chiefly appears in the altered form stek-* (stak-: stēk-), as in the Com. WGer. strong verb stekan* to prick, thrust: see Steek v. The formal equivalent of OE. stician* (WGer. type stikōjan, stekōjan, prob. denominative) occurs in OHG. stehhōn to prick, stab, cut the throat of; a parallel formation (WGer. type stikkjan*, also prob. denominative) is found as (M)Du., (M)LG. stikken to prick, pierce, stab, also to embroider (Sw. sticka, Da. stikke from LG.), OHG. sticchen in the same senses (MHG., mod.G. sticken to embroider).

It is impossible accurately to separate the history of this originally weak verb from that of the originally strong Steek v.[1] The latter was from an early period sometimes conjugated weak, while on the other hand the strong inflexions of steek became associated with stick, which, moreover, in the 16th c. formed a new strong pa. t. and pa. pple. stuck (cf. dig, dug). It is therefore often doubtful to which verb forms like stack, stoken, should be referred. Further, in some northern dialects the ME. stike is normally represented by stēke, and therefore coincides (at least graphically) with Steek v.[2] The wk. form sticked remained in somewhat common use until the 17th c., and still survives (in certain senses) in Sc. and various dialects (see Eng. Dial. Dict.).]

The long vowel of OE. stif, corresponding with that of the continental Teut. forms, is evidenced by the ME. spelling stijf, and by the pronunciation current in some mod. Eng. dialects. The present standard Eng. form, however, is abnormal as representing OE. stif; it is uncertain whether a shortening has taken place from some unknown cause, or whether OE. had beside stif an ablaut variant stif:—OTeut. type stifo-* or stībo-*. On the latter supposition, ME. stef, STEEVE a., may be a variant of this word.]

A. adj.

1. Motionless; not moving from one place, stationary; also, remaining in the same position or attitude, quiescent. a. as predicate or complement.

In stand, sit, lie still the word may be taken either as adj. or adv. In OE., however, there is evidence that in these collocations it was sometimes adv., and no evidence that it was ever adj., the constant form being stille (which always admits of being regarded as adv.), never stilla, which would be the proper form of the adj. when the subj. is fem. sing. or neut. pl. Further, in OS. and OHG. the adv. stillo, not the adj., is used with the verb 'to stand'. These phrases are therefore treated under STILL adv. 1.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES.

(VOLUME IX. FIRST HALF. SI—ST.)

STILLATION—STYX.

BY HENRY BRADLEY, HON. D.LITT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

THIS Part includes 2138 Main words, 1000 Special Combinations explained under these, and 933 Subordinate entries; in all 4071. The obvious combinations recorded and illustrated number 904, making a total of 4975. Of the Main words 442 (21 %) are marked † as obsolete, and 55 (2½ %) are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Dr. Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures:—

	Johnson.	Cassell' 'Encyclopædic' and Suppl.	'Century' Dict. and Suppl.	Here.
Words recorded	353	1749	2306	4975
Words illustrated by quotations	195	599	568	4055
Number of illustrative quotations	1393	1065	1979	30029

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 1122.

STILLATION—STRATUM.

About half the space of this section is occupied with words of native English origin. It is true that the list of words actually inherited from Old English is not very long; but it includes several words which, like stint sb.[1] and vb., stir vb., stock sb.[1], stone, stool, stoop, stop vb., storm, straight, strand, strap, either claim extended treatment on account of the multitude of their senses, or have given rise to a large number of compounds and derivatives, many of which have themselves a long and varied history. From Old Norse there is only stithy (with its variant stith). The French element is represented by the important words store, story sb.[1], story sb.[2] (or storey), stout, strain sb.[2] and vb., strait, strange, stranger, strangle; and French is the proximate source of some of the derivatives from Latin and Greek. Latin has furnished several words of considerable importance, as stimulus, stipend, stipulate, stolid, stratum (and their derivatives). From Greek (mainly through Latin and French) come stoic, stole sb.[1], stomach, stratagem, strategy, besides a number of scientific terms that have no popular currency, as stoicheiology, stomatic and the related words. Modern European languages have given stiver, stoep (Du.), stockbridge, stove (Flemish), stoccado, strappado (It.), and the newly-adopted strafe (Ger.). The only Celtic words are the Irish stokaghe (Spenser) and the Gaelic strath. Words of Oriental, African, and American Indian origin are altogether absent.

A word remarkable for the extraordinary diversity of its senses (the mutual relation of which can often only be conjectured) is stock sb.[1] Other words showing noteworthy sense-history are still-life, stimulate, stir vb., stole sb.[2] ('Groom of the Stole'), stomach, stone sb., stoop vb., stop sb. and vb., story sb.[1], straight, strain sb. and vb. A small but not uninteresting fact revealed by our quotations is that the phrase to strain at a gnat does not, as has been often asserted, owe its current form to a misprint in the Bible of 1611.

In etymology, the novelty that will probably attract most attention is that the long-accepted derivation of story sb.[2] (storey) is rejected, and the word shown to be ultimately identical with story sb.[1] Stool-ball and stow-ball, which have hitherto been regarded as one and the same word, are here distinguished as the names of entirely dissimilar games.

STRATUS—STYX.

An unusually large proportion of the space in this section is occupied by words that have come down from Old English. Not only is the list of primary words of native etymology exceptionally long, but very many of these (e.g. straw, streak, stream, strength, strike, string, strong, stub) have either developed a great variety of senses or have given rise to a multitude of derivatives and compounds. The Old French element in the vocabulary is not very strongly represented numerically, but it includes such important words as stray, stress, strife and strive, stubble, stuff, stun, sturdy. Of words taken from Latin, either directly or through the medium of learned adoptions in French, the number is extraordinarily large; and, though some of these are of rare occurrence or merely technical, many (as strenuous, strict, structure, student, study, stupefy, stupendous, stupid, style) are in everyday use. The few Greek derivatives, with one or two exceptions such as strophe, strophic, are terms belonging to modern science. There are no words from Celtic or Old Norse. There are a few adoptions from modern European languages; from Italian stucco, studio; from Continental Teut. stripe, stull, stulm, stum; from Russian two or three words occurring in the writings of travellers or historians. The words from Asiatic, African, and American languages, so abundant in some other portions of this Dictionary, are here wholly wanting.

The longest article in this section is that on the verb strike (29 columns). The word presents an extraordinary diversity of meanings, the mutual relation of which cannot always be determined with certainty. One interesting point is that the use of strike in the sense 'to refuse to work' is an 18th c. development from the nautical use in 'to strike a mast'. Among other words of remarkable sense-history may be mentioned stress, stretch, strict, string, stuff sb. and vb., style.

Etymological facts or suggestions not given in other Dictionaries will be found under the words stray, streak, stride vb., strike vb., strive, sty.

VI. A fund, store.

The senses grouped under this head are not found in the other Teut. languages except by adoption from English. Their origin is obscure, and possibly several different lines of development may have blended. Thus the application of the word to a trader's capital may partly involve the notion of a trunk or stem (branch I) from which the gains are an outgrowth, and partly that of 'fixed basis' or 'foundation' (branch II): cf. Fund. Sense 47 may be derived immediately from that of 'money-box', and have given rise to uses coincident with senses of different origin. The application to cattle is primarily a specific use of the sense 'store', but the notion of 'race' or 'breed' (sense 3) has had some share in its development.

52. The subscribed capital of a trading company, or the public debt of a nation, municipal corporation, or the like, regarded as transferable property held by the subscribers or creditors, and subject to fluctuations in market value. Also, in particularized sense, a kind of stock, a particular fund in which money may be invested.

In expressions like to buy or sell stocks, the word may be partly an application of sense 42, 'tally'. Cf. quot. 1714 under that sense.

In modern British use the application of the word is narrowed; the subscribed capital of a public company is called shares when it is divided into portions of uniform amount, and stock when any desired amount may be bought or sold. In British use, also, when there is no specific indication, stock is usually taken to refer to those portions of the National Debt, the principal of which is not repayable, the government being pledged only to the payment of interest in perpetuity.

Stole (stōul), *sb.*2 Also 5–6 stoole, 6 stoolle, stowle. [Commonly identified with STOLE *sb.*1, to which the unauthenticated sense of 'royal robe' is assigned. But there seems to be little doubt that the 'stole chamber', served by the Groom or Yeoman of the Stole, was originally the room containing the king's close-stool, and that the word is properly a variant of STOOL *sb.*1 As, however, the word as thus used was for centuries entirely dissociated from stool, and latterly had a different spelling, it is necessary to treat it separately.

In accounts of coronation ceremonies the king is said to have worn an ornament resembling a stole (STOLE *sb.*1 2); but it does not appear that this was actually called a 'stole' until modern times. The view that the Groom of the Stole derived his designation from this ornament is quite improbable.

Sir H. Nicolas's supposition, that the 'stole' was a kind of packing-chest, is a mistaken inference from the stole and male being mentioned together in certain documents.]
